of the executive committee of foreign missions be made the treasurer of all the executive committees of the assembly was referred to the committee on beneficence with instructions to report next year.

Another important feature of this report was that no special appeals for any cause of the assembly should be made to the churches during the coming year except in the months assigned to specific causes and then only in those churches not enlisted in the assembly's plan.

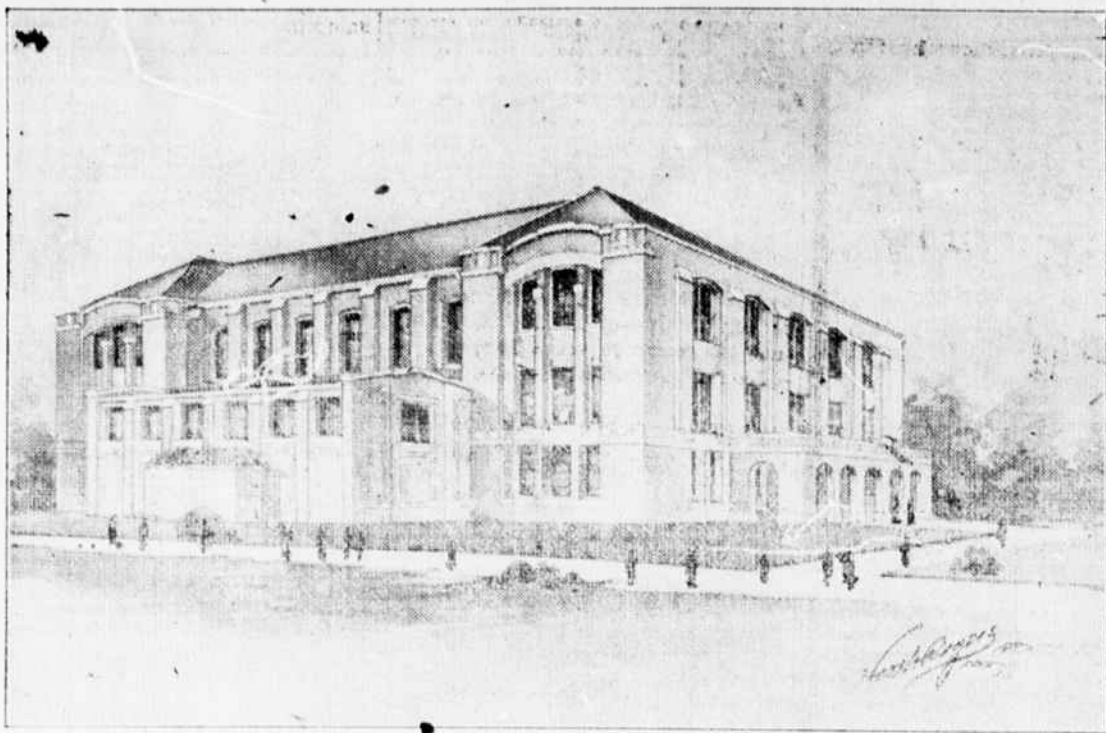

No session was held to-night and none will be held to-morrow afternoon, that time being given up to an entertainment feature.

WINTHROP COLLEGE NEW GYMNASIUM BUILDING

The cut here shown is a reproduction of the new gymnasium building recently erected in connection with Winthrop College at a cost of $60,000, while in fact, it is really a $100,000 plant.

The regulation size swimming pool in this building is the most complete to be found in any women's college throughout the entire south. Complete athletic equipment is now being installed. One of the future graduating requirements will be that the girls must master the art of swimming.

Winthrop College is certainly one of the finest educational institutions to be found not only in South Carolina, but throughout the south as well, and the management certainly deserves the highest praise for the splendid work which is being done for the girls in the great state of South Carolina. No doubt it is a source of pride and pleasure to any young lady to be able to refer to the fact that she is a graduate of this splendid educational institution—for certainly through same is she fitted for the high callings in life.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF PIERRE GUSTAVE TOUTANT DE BEAUREGARD

Written by Miss Laura Gilbert Williams, age 12 who is a pupil in the seventh grade of the Lancaster Graded School, and received honorable mention by the South Carolina Division of U. D. C. in a recent contest in which a gold medal was offered for best essay on the life of General Beauregard.

Pierre Gustave Toutant de Beauregard was born May 23, 1818 in the parish of St. Bernard, about twenty miles from New Orleans. He entered West Point, graduating with distinction in 1838. Remaining at West Point, he was appointed Lieutenant of Engineers, later being assigned to Newport, Rhode Island. In 1840, he was in charge of the Louisiana fortifications at New Orleans, being again in his native state. During the Mexican war, he rendered valuable service and was twice wounded. In 1860, Beauregard was appointed superintendent at West Point with the rank of colonel.

About this time, the south was in a desperate state of agitation. South Carolina, the Palmetto State, being the first to secede from the Union. Louisiana soon followed. In 1861, Beauregard resigned from the army. An ardent southerner, dictated by heart and conscience, he returned to his beloved southland and cast his lot with the Confederacy.

He was soon placed in command of the Confederate forces at Fort Sumter, the scene of the first victory of the war between the states. Here, after several days of terrific bombardment, with feeble resistance, on April 14, 1861, the Fort was surrendered by Major Anderson. It was here that Beauregard was hailed as the first hero of the Confederacy.

Beauregard was essentially an engineer, and after the surrender of Fort Sumter, he busied himself in organizing the Confederate army and drawing plans of attack. The Confederate congress, in appreciation of this valuable work, conferred on him the rank of general.

We next hear of General Beauregard in the battle of Manassas or Bull Run, leading his men in the thickest of the fight, the difficult task of rallying and reforming his troops, being performed by him with skill and science. A burning shell killed his horse under him, tearing the heel from his boot. Another horse was provided and he continued fighting.

It was at this battle that the human side of General Beauregard's character was beautifully portrayed. Riding over the battlefield, he found Captain Ricketts lying on the ground desperately wounded. Recognizing an old friend of years gone by, he asked him if he could be of service. He then sent his own surgeons to care for the wounded captain, and detailed one of his staff to make him comfortable when he was carried to Richmond as a prisoner of war.

After the Union defeat at Manassas, owing to his forceful personality, brilliant mind and gallantry, Beauregard was looked upon as the coming Napoleon, steadily climbing the ladder of fame as one of the noted leaders of the Confederacy.

In 1862, General Beauregard was transferred to the Department of the Mississippi, strengthening the defenses at Nashville, and later, assuming command of the southern forces in the valley of the Mississippi until summoned to join General Albert Sidney Johnston in resisting the advance of General Grant on the field of Shiloh. General Johnston receiving his death wound in this battle, the command devolved upon Beauregard. He continued the fight, capturing General Prentiss with several thousand men.

At the close of the first day's fight, southern hopes were high. General Beauregard with an army worn and weary to exhaustion, rested his hopes on the arrival in the night of General Van Dorn with an army of twenty thousand men, but Van Dorn did not arrive, and the morrow found Beauregard without the expected reinforcements. Grave fears now possessed him, but realizing the splendid courage and hopes of his army, and relying on their tested valor, he faced the difficult task before him. Twenty-five thousand fresh troops were added to the Union army during the night to be hurled the next day on the Confederates.

Early the next morning, Shiloh was again the storm center and General Beauregard, hour after hour, watched his men first gaining and then losing. Late in the afternoon, convinced that he was fighting a losing battle, he prudently and skillfully withdrew. Addressing his soldiers later, he said: "You have done your duty. Your countrymen are proud of your deeds on the bloody field of Shiloh, confident in the ultimate result of your valor." The loss in this battle on each side exceeded ten thousand men and never before on the continent, had there been fighting equal to it.

Throughout the remaining years of the war, Beauregard gave material aid to the Confederacy, but his career during the last three years of the war, while always meritorious, was not as brilliant as in the beginning. In 1862-63, he was in charge of the defenses of historic old Charleston.

In 1864, he left Charleston, returning to Virginia, where his timely arrival and repulse of Butler, saved Richmond from capture. At the close of this year, he was assigned to the military division of the southwest, working hard to check Sherman's "March to the Sea." In April 1865, he surrendered at Greensboro, N. C.

Thus we see Beauregard throughout the four years of our great conflict fairly earning the distinction of southern hero. All honor to Pierre Gustave Toutant de Beauregard and to our southern soldiers, who bravely fought for a "Lost Cause!"

After the war, General Beauregard made his home in New Orleans, where he died in the year 1893.
